

Opinion: Interpreting the new history of the Old West

By Stephen Aron

Not too long ago, historians of the American West joined their artistic brethren in celebrating what we now think of as the “Old West.” For historians and artists, the “winning of the West” was a glorious achievement that heralded the triumph of “civilization” over “savagery.” Indeed, by the conventional scholarly wisdom and orthodox artistic vision, the vanquishing of Indians and the march of manifest destiny made America great and made Americans special.

In recent decades, however, most historians—and many Americans—have rejected this perspective. Dismantling cherished fables about the Old West and stripping the romance from the history of “Westward Ho,” newer studies have exhumed the human casualties and environmental costs of American expansion. Offering little glory, these interpretations of how the West was lost have accented the savagery of American civilization.

The de Young Museum’s exhibition, “Ed Ruscha and the Great American West,” and its companion, “Wild West: Plains to the Pacific” at the Legion of Honor—both in San Francisco—invite us to scrutinize both the celebration and its demise. In many ways, this revisioning of western American art parallels alterations in the content and meaning of western American history. In both art and history, longstanding and powerful myths have fallen as subjects have broadened and contemporary viewpoints have shifted.

Back in the 19th century, celebrations of territorial expansion were commonplace among American historians. In his multi-volume account of “The Winning of the West” and other historical writings, Theodore Roosevelt admitted that the shedding of blood was not always "agreeable," but deemed it the "healthy sign of the virile strength" of the American people. As president of the American Historical Association and as president of the United States, Roosevelt exulted in "our manifest destiny to swallow up the land of all adjoining nations who were too weak to withstand us." He judged it "desirable for the good of humanity at large that the American people should ultimately crowd out the Mexicans from their sparsely populated Northern provinces" and wrest the rest of the West from Indians.

Popular as Roosevelt's histories were in his time, it was his contemporary, Frederick Jackson Turner, who put forward the interpretation that gained enduring scholarly traction. Most prominently in his 1893 essay on "The Significance of the Frontier in American History," Turner assigned westward expansion the central role in the history of the United States. He contended that it had not only enlarged the nation's territory, but had also accounted for the individualistic and democratic character of its people and its institutions. In Turner's view, the process of moving west separated Americans from their European roots (and in Turner's imagination, the designation "American" referred exclusively to people of European ancestry). From what Turner and his contemporaries referred to as the "Great American West" then sprang the sources of American exceptionalism and American greatness.

Subsequent generations of historians of the American West took their cues from Turner's "frontier thesis." Some echoed it. Some extended it. Some amended it. Through the first half of the 20th century, however, few sought to challenge Turner's belief in the fundamental importance of the frontier to American development or to question the exaltation of westward expansion.

That has changed over the last half century. Protests against the Vietnam War and the spread of various civil rights movements had a profound impact on the interpretation of American history in general, and western American history in particular. If American expansion led to Vietnam, a conflict that drew frequent metaphorical comparison to the supposed lawless violence of the Wild West, then it was not something to be cheered. At the same time, liberation struggles at home inspired historians to look beyond the white, male protagonists who had previously dominated frontier epics. In step with other American histories, scholars of the American West turned their attentions to the expectations and experiences of the unsung and the undone.

With a wider cast and an anti-imperial angle of vision, interpretations of the western past veered from the triumphant to the tragic. The titles of the two most influential surveys of what came to be called "the new western history" attested to this shift in orientation: "The Legacy of Conquest" by Patricia Limerick (1987) and "It's Your Misfortune and None of My Own" by Richard White (1991). Synthesizing scholarship from the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, these books asserted that conquest and its legacy brought misfortunes aplenty to the defeated and even to the supposed victors. The more general misfortunes traced to the environmental blowback that followed efforts to turn the land into what it was not, to transform a mostly arid and sparsely populated region into an agricultural "garden" and a home for multiplying millions of residents.

In the revisionist mirror, the Great West didn't look very great anymore, a gloom and doom view that not all historians, and certainly not all Americans, embraced. Critics claimed the new western history overlooked the achievements and exaggerated the evils of American expansion. The unbalanced exposition, complained the novelist Larry McMurty, unfairly presented the western past as an unrelenting course in "failure studies."

Similar debates erupted among art historians and grabbed much public notice in 1991. That year, the Smithsonian's National Museum of American Art presented "The West as America: Reinterpreting Images of the American Frontier, 1820-1920." In the exhibition, the curators challenged both the realism and the romance of western art. According to the exhibition's gallery guide, the assembled works, which included masterpieces by the most renowned artists of the American West were "not so much records of activities or places" as they were "a means of persuading people that westward expansion was good for the nation and would benefit all who participated in it." This proposition put western art and western artists in the service of manifest destiny, an ideology that led painters, sculptors, and photographers to mask "the problems created by westward expansion."

"The West as America" exhibition was quite controversial. Some visitors limited their vitriol to the comments book in the gallery. Others vented their outrage in op-ed pieces. In response to the uproar, several congressmen demanded that the National Museum of American Art be defunded for allowing this blasphemy to be perpetrated against western art. That campaign failed, but the planned national tour of the exhibition was cancelled.

In terms of public notice, by far the greatest impact of changing views about the history of the American West registered at the movies. The social currents emanating from the 1960s that rewrote western histories and reinterpreted the meaning of still images also dramatically upended the art of motion pictures. For decades, "Westerns" ruled Hollywood. "Epics" and "B-westerns" filled movie theaters from the 1920s to the 1950s—and dominated American television programming in the 1950s. But during the 1960s, traditional, heroic Westerns began losing their popular appeal. Far fewer were produced. Those that were often inverted the genre's conventions about heroes and villains and the righteousness of violence and manifest destiny. In landmark films such as Sergio Leone's The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly" (1966), Sam Peckinpah's "The Wild Bunch" (1969), Arthur Penn's "Little Big Man" (1970), and Robert Altman's "McCabe and Mrs. Miller" (1971), the Old West became a stage on which 1960s critiques of American capitalism and imperialism played out. Arguably, though, the reversing of traditional western roles did not reach its apotheosis until 1991 when "Dances with Wolves" won eight Academy Awards.

"Dances with Wolves" reigned at the box office and at the Oscars, but over the last quarter century, the best historical scholarship has aimed at more than mere inversion of old myths about the Old West. One important direction has been to compare and connect what happened in the American West with parallel places and processes elsewhere. Departing from Turner's claim that the frontier set the U.S. apart from its European roots, historians of the American West have instead emphasized the commonalities between American and other "colonialisms." More specifically, the construct of "settler colonialism" has emerged as a key to situating the American experience in a broader global context. Further depriving the American West of its uniqueness, historians have adopted the lens of "ethnic cleansing," or worse "genocide," to understand American expansions and the accompanying displacement and sometimes devastation of indigenous peoples.

The most compelling western histories written in the last quarter century confront the complexities of past and present. This begins with the recognition of how deep that past is, with histories that commence well before the West was American and with excavations that reveal the diversity and dynamism of Native America prior to the arrival of European colonizers. From archaeological and other sources, historians have now recovered rich precolonial worlds and complex societies that continued after Indians encountered people from Europe and Africa, weaving a fascinating new understanding of how natives and newcomers met and mingled.

Rescuing indigenous people from the condescension of New Age romanticism that turns them into ever peaceful, perfect ecologists, newer histories have shown how Indians not only resisted European colonialism, but also in some parts of North America carried out their own expansions. The best of these newer western histories detail as well how prolonged interactions resulted in ethnic crossings as well as ethnic cleansings. Most visibly, this intercourse produced mixed-race offspring, but historians have also tracked a wide range of exchanges that led to a blending of cultures. Such amalgamations have remained a hallmark of western American cultures in the 20th and now the 21st centuries

The history of the American West, like the art of the American West, isn't what it used to be. No doubt, many lament the changes and pine for the myths that western histories (and western art) once celebrated. But if we are to make sense of the West's multi-faceted evolutions and figure out how we can live together, and live sustainably, in this region, we don't need one-dimensional tales. Rather we need histories and art that respect the past, wrestling, as historians and artists must, with the complexities that challenge us still.

Stephen Aron is a professor of history and Robert N. Burr department chair at UCLA. In 2017, he will be the president of the Western History Association. His most recent book is "The American West: A Very Short Introduction" (Oxford University Press, 2015).

Bridging the workplace generation gap

By Sarah Anderson, Deseret News

With millennials coming to dominate the workforce and baby boomers refusing to retire, crossing the generational divide at work becomes ever more of an issue.

The term “generational gap” was first used in the 1960s to express the belief that the old and the young had substantial differences in thought, AARP noted. And it’s a divide that has still carried over into present day, with generations separated under umbrella terms such as “millennials” or “Generation X,” and recent events such as the Brexit vote demonstrating there are differences between the old and young generations’ stance on issues, it continued.

The divide is perhaps even greater as millennials have come to make up the largest age segment of the American workforce, the New York Times noted. Many older employees now find themselves answering to a younger boss.

Read the whole story

NV Energy hopes to shutter coal-generated plant early

By Daniel Rothberg, Las Vegas Sun

NV Energy asked regulators Monday for permission to retire a utility-owned coal plant 10 months earlier than expected as part of an effort to move toward a cleaner fuel portfolio.

The utility shut down three of four generating units at its 257-megawatt Reid Gardner Generating Station in Moapa at the end of 2014. If regulators at the Public Utilities Commission of Nevada approve its request, it will shut down the final Reid Gardner unit Feb. 28.

NV Energy had originally planned to fully shut down the coal-fired plant in December 2017.

Read the whole story

July ‘absolutely’ Earth’s hottest month recorded

By Jason Samenow, Washington Post

NASA data reveal the Earth’s temperature reached its highest point in 136 years of record-keeping during July.

“July 2016 was absolutely the hottest month since the instrumental records began,” tweeted Gavin Schmidt, who directs NASA’s Goddard Institute for Space Studies, which is responsible for temperature measurements.

It was the 10th-straight month of record-breaking temperatures in NASA’s analysis, a substantial 0.18 degrees (0.1 Celsius) warmer than the previous hottest July in 2011.

Read the whole story

Lightning catches tree on fire near Truckee

Several lightning strikes have hit the ground in the Truckee area today.

In the late afternoon of Aug. 17 there was a tree on fire in the Granite area near China Wall, which is confined to one tree with no threat to the wildland at this time, according to Truckee police officers.

“There is also a helicopter being used for any remote areas to help with any fires from the lightning strikes,” officers said in a statement.

All resources are out checking reports of smokes in the area.

– Lake Tahoe News staff report

History of underwear exposed in S. Lake Tahoe

Undergarments are on display at the South Lake Tahoe Museum. Photos/Denise Haerr

By Denise Haerr

When one walks into the lobby of the South Lake Tahoe Library, one sees something unexpected in the display case – underwear.

The Friends of the Library in partnership with the Lake Tahoe Historical Society are hosting a presentation titled A Brief History of Underwear.

Diane Johnson, president of the LTHS, has gathered various dainties, from the museum's collection to showcase Tahoe's historic unmentionables. Many of the pieces have never been on display.

This is an opportunity to find out the “wear and why” about underwear.

Some of the items are on display for the first time.

Jan Loverin, who will be giving a talk about the undergarments, said, "This lecture looks at the history of various forms and styles of undergarments worn by our ancestors. Starting with the Egyptians and going through the millennia, this PowerPoint program reveals fascinating facts about corsetry, drawers – panties and undershorts, petticoats, bustles, farthingales, and other undergarments people have worn throughout western civilization."

Loverin knows her stuff. For more than 30 years she has been the curator of Clothing and Textiles at the Nevada State Museum's Marjorie Russell Clothing and Textile Research Center in Carson City.

The free talk is Aug. 30 at 6pm at the South Lake Tahoe Library, 1000 Rufus Allen Blvd. The exhibit at the library ends the same day.

Letter: EDC supervisors don't care about citizens

To the community,

At the Aug. 16, El Dorado County Board of Supervisors meeting, Brian Veerkamp made a motion to extend a property-tax subsidy to incentivize seniors to move into El Dorado County. He justified this subsidy, known as Proposition 90, by stating that he must also represent Realtors, not just citizens.

It was apparent from the discussion that the greatest benefactors from the decision will be production home builders such as Lennar Homes, the county Board of Realtors, and seniors moving from the Bay Area and Los Angeles. Three supervisors felt that because these seniors have more discretionary funds to throw around, it justifies the subsidy to entice them to move to El Dorado County.

My opinion is that this will continue to keep the market inflated and continue to make it hard for young families to stay here. As one Realtor pointed out last month, he witnessed a Prop. 90 recipient create and win a price war on a house because of their advantage using the Prop. 90 subsidy. Supervisor Veerkamp attempted to lay the housing inequality on the feet of those that have fought to retain the rural character of El Dorado County. It was mentioned that if they could just put in more high-density housing apartments along the corridor, young families might have more of a chance. Economics tell us that when you give someone a discount on paying their fair share for services, that discount has to be made up by somebody. It was made pretty clear at the meeting that three of our supervisors feel very strongly about who they will be favoring, this does nothing for existing residents and businesses.

Supervisor (Sue) Novasel stated that she disagreed that there was not a benefit since these new seniors will be spending money and adding to the sales tax, even though everyone admitted that there is no data to prove that statement. Maybe living in Tahoe, Supervisor Novasel does not realize that the homes being sold (mostly high priced by Lennar Homes) are located a hop and a skip from a massive amount of retail in Folsom. Well, I guess Folsom should be happy, but it's a sad day when our supervisors favor out of town affluent seniors over our struggling young families.

Sue Taylor, Camino

Fire torches elk, trout habitat in Great Basin

The severity of the fire in Great Basin National Park is partially being blamed on climate change and past management practices. Photo/National Park Service/Gretchen Baker

By Benjamin Spillman, Reno Gazette-Journal

In addition to one human fatality the Strawberry Fire in Great Basin National Park has burned thousands of acres of wildlife habitat.

Park officials are just now beginning to survey damage from the lightning-caused fire that's burned 4,600 acres and resulted in the death of a firefighter who was struck by a falling tree.

The fire three miles northwest of the park visitor center is 76 percent contained and full containment is expected by Friday.

Read the whole story

Snippets about Lake Tahoe

- Lake Tahoe Community College has been rated one of the top two-year schools in California.
- National Championship Air Races has partnered with select Costco stores in Northern Nevada and Northern California to offer discounted tickets to the Sept. 14-18 event in Reno.
- United Way of Northern Nevada and the Sierra has raised $100 million since its inception in 1942.
- The East and West Carson River has been stocked with 1,800 pounds of rainbow trout, while West Carson also got cutthroat trout.

K's Kitchen: Incredible summer dessert

By Kathryn Reed

You'll want to devour this dessert. It's decadent, delicious and divine.

Having a cordial with dessert is rather common, especially at restaurants. This concoction is the libation and dessert in one.

With peaches being so wonderful right now, this is the perfect way to end a summer dinner. It would be just as easy to grill the peaches, which would also give it a slightly different taste than the oven.

It's fast, so if you are serving it to guests, you will not be taken away from the party for long.

Amaretto and Peaches

5 peaches, halved and pitted

1 T butter

$\frac{1}{2}$ C Amaretto

$\frac{1}{4}$ C brown sugar

1 tsp vanilla

Vanilla ice cream, optional

Heat the butter, Amaretto, sugar and vanilla in a small saucepan until the sugar is dissolved. Remove from heat.

Baste the peach halves with the sauce. Place them cut side down in a pan. Cook in 350-degree oven. Turn after a few minutes, when peaches start to soften and skins begin to lightly shrivel. Then fill pit area with more sauce. Bake until liquid is absorbed.

Serve with ice cream. Spoon a little sauce onto each peach.